The study program of primary school teaching is structured following the principle of systematicity and gradualness, developing primarily the general knowledge and understanding of students about the overall educational system; its philosophical, epistemological, socio-psychological, and socio-historical context, and within that context, the position of the teacher's work, tasks, activities, responsibilities, and knowledge in the field of theoretical, practical, conceptual, comparative, and critical perspectives in the scientific field according to the appropriate methodology. The acquisition of general knowledge and understanding is accompanied by the development of general communication skills and learning skills. According to the defined structure of the study program, these general knowledge and understandings of students are concretized into specific knowledge and understandings about the phenomenon of upbringing and education, classical and modern pedagogical theories and concepts; and acquaintances with the foundations of the teaching profession. In this context, the study program represents an organized system of theoretical knowledge and practical experiences gained within the school framework. Future teachers are prepared not only for work in the classroom but also for work and collaboration with parents, professional colleagues, teams, and the local community.
